Law firms across Charlotte have established COVID-19 task forces and are using their websites as resource centers to provide information to help businesses navigate the coronavirus pandemic. The Charlotte Business Journal examined how firms are responding to the outbreak and spoke with Mason Alexander on why Fisher Phillips transformed its website into a COVID-19 resource page for visitors.

Mason said: “Information on the website includes answers to broader questions about employment issues that small-business owners in particular may not have the resources to resolve themselves. We were fielding a lot of questions early ... (last) week on emergency paid leave and the Family Medical Leave Act. (The) latter part of the week was all about essential businesses and travel letters for employees.”
