

Charlotte Attorney Speaks with The Associated Press on Federal Vaccine Mandate

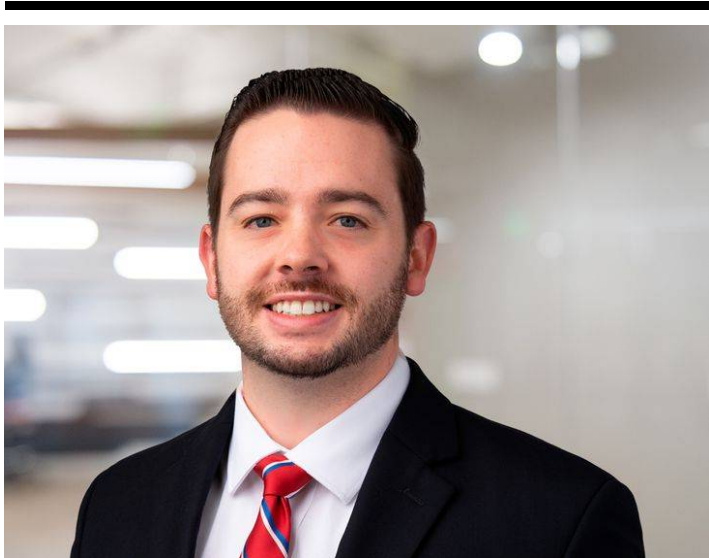

News
9.16.21

In an interview with the Associated Press, Nicholas Hulse discusses the broader implications of President Biden’s federal vaccine mandate. Nicholas says that some big employers may fear losing vaccine-resistant employees to smaller businesses that aren’t covered by the mandate. “It may actually help these smaller businesses who are struggling to attract employees,” he says. Additionally, Nicholas says that the mandate is “going to be difficult to enforce.” OSHA likely will rely less on its own inspectors uncovering violations and more on complaints from insiders — workers who grow “frustrated either with the employer for not implementing it or with fellow employees who are not following the mandate.”
