Publication

9.27.22

In a bylined article published in The Benefits Law Journal, John Polson and Richard Meneghello provide a detailed description of the Worker Flexibility and Choice Act that was recently introduced in Congress. The authors explain that this bill would create a hybrid job classification for gig economy workers that would allow businesses to avoid misclassification claims and give gig workers the flexibility they crave. They proceed to summarize the bill and discuss potential problems that lie ahead, noting that some claim the law is anti-worker and would short-change gig workers from receiving minimum wage and overtime pay.
